To Whom It May Concern:

The findings of CCHREI's Environmental Sectors Data Development (ESDD) project have recently been published in a report entitled Human Resources in the Canadian Environmental Sectors: Final Report 2000. This report provides a wealth of information on Canada's environmental sectors ranging from a detailed breakdown of environmental employment within Canada to the types of skills in demand, the training needs of the industry, and the human resource factors that may affect future growth.

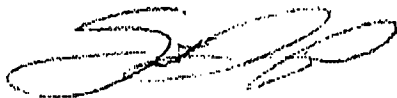

The ESDD project was initiated by the Canadian Council for Human Resources in the Environment Industry (CCHREI) in collaboration with Human Resources Development Canada (HRDC). The first phase involved the identification and documentation of priority human resource issues. The second and third phases were the data collection phases, with Phase II involving a survey of the employers of environmental practitioners and Phase III, a series of focus groups conducted across Canada.

Originally developed to update a previous study published in 1993 by the federal government, Human Resources in the Environment Industry, the ESDD project's objective was to obtain the critical information required for setting national human resource strategies that will ensure the prosperity of the Canadian environmental sectors.
